Problems such as poverty, unemployment, teen pregnancy, child abuse, violence, and substance abuse are common among the nation's youth. Many young people are considered at-risk¹ and many have also had contact with the juvenile justice system. In response, the Congress has passed legislation over the years creating numerous federal programs to address the needs of delinquent and at-risk youth. While this commitment on the part of the federal government is essential in helping such youth, in the current period of ever-tightening budget constraints, questions have been raised about potential waste from program overlap and duplication of services.

This report responds to your request that we (1) identify federal programs that serve at-risk or delinquent youth and provide information on the amount of fiscal year 1995 appropriations dedicated toward youth;

¹The term "at-risk" can have different meanings in different contexts. We are using the term in a broad sense to refer to youth who, due to certain characteristics or experiences, are statistically more likely than other youth to encounter certain problems—legal, social, financial, educational, emotional, and health—in the future.

(2) provide information on various program characteristics, such as services provided and target groups; and (3) assess the potential for program overlap and duplication of services. To identify these programs, we reviewed applicable laws, current literature, and previous GAO reports. We also reviewed the 1994 Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance, which contains detailed information on all federal domestic programs. To obtain additional data, such as estimates of fiscal year 1995 appropriations dedicated toward at-risk or delinquent youth, we contacted agency officials knowledgeable about each program.

We included programs on our list on the basis of the services they provided and their target groups. The services we focused on were self-sufficiency skills, crime/violence intervention, gang intervention, mentoring, tutoring, conflict resolution, counseling, substance abuse intervention, job training assistance, support services, focused activities, parental/family intervention, planning and program development, training and technical assistance, research/evaluation, capital improvements, and clearinghouses.² The target groups included youth who were economically disadvantaged; abused or neglected; drug or alcohol abusers; missing, exploited, or abducted; runaways or homeless; school dropouts; victims of crime; minorities; juvenile offenders; delinquents; or considered at-risk or high-risk.³ We defined “youth” to include children at least 5 years old, adolescents, and young adults up to 24 years old. Finally, we included not only clearly established programs, but also funding streams that supported specific youth-related activities, such as demonstration projects, pilot projects, clearinghouses, research and evaluation efforts, and other initiatives.⁴

We did our work between February and October 1995 in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards.

Results in Brief

The federal government currently has 131 programs, administered by 16 different departments and other agencies, that may be used to benefit at-risk or delinquent youth. For the programs on which we were able to ²These services are defined in app. I. We also had a category for “other” services.

³We also had a category for “all youth,” because some programs claim not to target any particular youth subgroups, and a category for “other” groups.

⁴However, we excluded general public education, Aid to Families With Dependent Children, Supplemental Security Income, and general health programs (including Medicaid and nutrition) from our list of programs because their purpose is not directly related to juvenile delinquents or at-risk youth.

obtain funding data (109 programs, or 83 percent), total estimated appropriations used for youth in fiscal year 1995 exceeded $4 billion.

Many of the programs we identified were authorized to provide funding for multiple services, ranging from counseling to job training assistance to research and evaluation efforts. For example, we found that 23 percent of the programs could fund seven or more services. The services most commonly authorized were substance abuse intervention and training and technical assistance (53 programs each). Many programs also had multiple target groups, ranging from economically disadvantaged youth to abused/neglected youth to school dropouts. For example, 33 percent targeted three or more youth groups. The group most commonly targeted was all youth (35 programs).

The current system of federal programs for at-risk or delinquent youth creates the potential for overlap of services. Our analysis showed that, in many cases, it was possible for two or more programs to provide similar services to the same target group. While we cannot be certain whether overlap is actually occurring, our analysis raises questions about the overall efficiency of federal efforts to assist at-risk and delinquent youth.

Background

The social environment in which many youth live today has substantially increased the likelihood that they will become delinquent or experience other negative outcomes. Consider, for example, the following statistics:

- About 20 percent of children in the United States live in poverty, and for minority children the percentage is about twice as high. Moreover, poor teens are more than three times as likely as other teens to drop out of school.
- While the high-school dropout rate has been declining over the past two decades, in 1993 it was still over 10 percent for all races combined, and over 27 percent for Hispanics.
- The unemployment rate for youth is much higher than for adults. From 1991 to 1994, the average unemployment rate among males 16 to 24 years old was 14.3 percent, compared with 5.7 percent for those aged 25 and older. During the same period, the average unemployment rate among females 16 to 24 years old was 12.3 percent, compared with 5.3 percent for those aged 25 and older.
- In 1992, child protective service agencies received an estimated 1.9 million reports of child abuse and neglect. In 41 percent of these reports, investigation found the maltreatment substantiated or indicated.

Furthermore, research indicates that being abused or neglected as a child increases the likelihood of arrest as a juvenile by 53 percent, and as an adult by 38 percent.

- The United States has the highest teen alcohol- and drug-abuse rate of any industrialized nation. While student use of alcohol and other drugs has declined since the early 1980s, a study found that in 1992 more than 75 percent of 12th graders reported using alcohol during the previous year, and almost 25 percent reported using marijuana.
- Between 1988 and 1992, the juvenile arrest rate for violent crime increased 47 percent—more than twice the increase for people 18 years of age and older. In addition, the number of violent crimes committed against youth aged 12 to 17 increased 25 percent. In 1991, youth aged 12 to 23 were more likely to be victims of a violent crime than were people past their mid-20s. In 1992, roughly 1 out of every 13 juveniles reported being a victim of a violent crime.

While the Congress has established numerous programs to respond to problems such as these, it has also begun to look closely at the efficiency and effectiveness of federal programs in many areas to see if improvements can be made. For example, our past work on federal employment training programs suggested that a major overhaul was needed, in part because many such programs targeted the same clients, shared the same goal, and provided similar services.⁵

Principal Findings

Federal Approach to Helping At-Risk and Delinquent Youth Consists of Many Programs in Numerous Agencies

We identified 131 federal programs that serve at-risk or delinquent youth.⁶ Over 60 percent of these programs are administered by two cabinet-level departments—Health and Human Services (58 programs) and Justice (22 programs). An additional eight departments, three independent agencies, one federal commission, one presidential council, and one “quasi-official”

Estimated Fiscal Year 1995 Appropriations Used for Youth Exceeded $4 Billion

The estimated total amount of federal appropriations dedicated to at-risk and delinquent youth in fiscal year 1995 was over $4 billion.⁸ This is a conservative estimate, however, because it is based on information for 109 (83 percent) of the programs we identified; for the remaining 22 programs, ⁷Quasi-official agencies are not executive-branch agencies, but are required by statute to publish certain information about their activities and programs in the Federal Register. The quasi-official agency in our analysis is the State Justice Institute.

⁸We present officials' estimates of the amount used for youth services, rather than reporting the full appropriation for a program, because some programs also serve individuals outside our defined age range (5 to 24).

officials were unable to estimate the portion of total appropriations that was dedicated to youth. Fifteen of the 109 programs reported using no appropriated funds on youth in fiscal year 1995.⁹ Of the 94 programs that reported using some appropriated funds for youth, the estimated amount ranged from $100,000 (for the Department of Agriculture’s Urban Tree House Research Program) to about $1.1 billion (for Job Corps, administered by the Department of Labor); the median amount used was $10 million. About 31 percent of the programs estimated using from $0.1 million to $4.9 million, while about 22 percent estimated using $30 million or more (see fig. 1).

Figure 1: Estimated Amount of Fiscal Year 1995 Appropriations Used to Serve At-Risk and Delinquent Youth

Note: Analysis based on 94 programs that reported using some amount of their FY 1995 appropriation on youth.

Most of the programs we identified use one of two methods to distribute federal funds: project grants, in which funds are awarded to state, local, or private service providers on a competitive or discretionary basis, and formula grants, in which funds are distributed on the basis of factors such ⁹Some of these programs did not receive an appropriation in fiscal year 1995; others had their appropriation rescinded.

as state population. Of the 131 programs we identified, 50 percent used project grants to disseminate funds and 28 percent used formula grants.¹⁰

Most Programs Support Multiple Services

In identifying programs serving at-risk or delinquent youth, we focused on a total of 17 authorized services or activities, ranging from various direct services to research and evaluation efforts to capital improvement projects. We found that many programs were authorized to award grants for several different types of services (see fig. 2). While 13 percent of the programs were authorized to fund a single type of service, about twice as many were authorized to provide 4 to 6 different services, and about 14 percent could provide funds for 10 or more services.

¹⁰As for the remaining 22 percent of programs, some used another type of funding mechanism or a combination of mechanisms, some did not disseminate funds, and for some we were unable to determine the funding mechanism.

The services most commonly authorized were substance abuse intervention and training and technical assistance (53 programs each), and the service least commonly authorized was capital improvements (10 programs), as shown in figure 3.

Note: Forty-three programs were authorized to fund at least one other type of service not listed above.

Programs Often Have More Than One Target Group

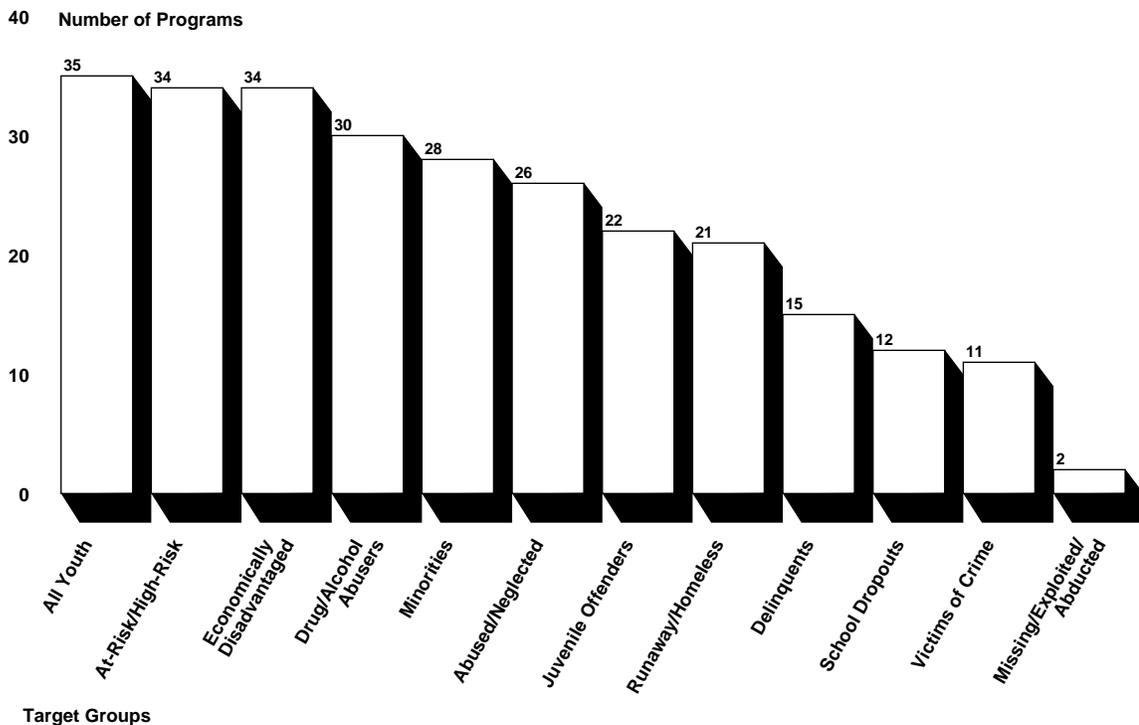

In identifying programs serving at-risk or delinquent youth, we also focused on a total of 12 target groups, ranging from economically disadvantaged youth to drug/alcohol abusers to school dropouts. We found that many programs target their services to several of these youth groups (see fig. 4). Our analysis showed that about half the programs had just one target group and about half had two or more target groups, including 12 percent with five or more target groups.

Figure 4: Many Programs Have Multiple Target Groups

The group most commonly targeted among the programs we identified was all youth (35 programs), while the group targeted by the fewest programs was missing/exploited/abducted youth (2 programs), as shown in figure 5.

Figure 5: Many Programs Have Similar Target Groups

Note: Forty-three programs had at least one target group not listed above.

Potential for Program Overlap

The federal system for providing services to at-risk and delinquent youth clearly creates the potential for program overlap. We identified numerous instances in which two or more programs could be funding the same service to the same target group (see table 2, pp. 12 and 13). For example, we found 17 programs targeting at-risk/high-risk youth that were authorized to fund counseling services. Similarly, we found 14 programs targeting juvenile offenders that could fund substance abuse intervention. With 17 services and 12 target groups in our analysis, 204 service/target-group combinations are possible. We found 117 instances in which 6 or more programs had the same service/target group combination, including 54 instances involving 10 or more programs.

This analysis, however, must be interpreted cautiously for several reasons. First, because two programs cover the same service/target-group combination does not necessarily mean that both programs actually do provide that particular service to that target group. As noted earlier, most programs can fund multiple services and many have multiple target groups, but in a given year a program might focus its efforts on a subset of those services and target groups. Thus, two programs that are authorized to fund the same service and that share the same target group might actually provide the same service to different groups, different services to the same group, or different services to different groups.

Second, our approach combines programs with widely differing scopes and objectives. For example, we did not distinguish between programs that give formula grants to all states and agency efforts that support a small number of service demonstration projects. In addition, this analysis treats all minorities as a single target group, whereas two programs serving minorities might actually target youth from different racial/ethnic groups. Moreover, our analysis does not take into account other important factors, such as the age range of the youth served or the geographical location where the services are provided. Further, this analysis cannot help determine whether a particular individual is receiving the same service from more than one program. Finally, we have not included the “other” categories for services and target groups in our analysis.

Therefore, without a more detailed review of the individual programs we identified, it is impossible to say for certain whether or to what extent program overlap is occurring; table 2 merely demonstrates some of the ways in which overlap may be taking place.

Concluding Observations

The federal response to the problems of delinquent and at-risk youth is currently manifested in 131 separate programs administered by 16 departments and other agencies. Many of the programs are authorized to fund multiple services and are targeted toward multiple youth groups, creating the potential for program overlap and duplication of services.

On one hand, the current system may be appropriate for responding to the needs of delinquent and at-risk youth. To the extent that many factors are associated with becoming at-risk or delinquent, and to the extent that youth may be at risk of numerous negative outcomes, the current set of programs may be appropriate for dealing with a wide range of service needs. This arrangement may also provide state, local, and other service providers with a substantial degree of flexibility in making service decisions based on the particular needs of their primary target groups.

On the other hand, the current system raises questions concerning efficiency. Our work suggests that efficiencies might be gained by having a smaller number of consolidated programs for at-risk or delinquent youth. For example, it would probably be more efficient to have one program covering a service/target-group combination, administered by a single federal office, than several programs administered by several different offices.¹¹ However, deciding what, if anything, should be done to reform the system would require consideration of how individual programs currently operate, with special attention to how consolidation could reduce overall administrative costs. It would also require careful thought about what such a system should look like and how it should function, including its scope, design, goals, strategies, and so forth.

Agency Comments

The information presented in this report was reviewed by officials from all the departments and agencies that operate the programs we identified. They generally verified that our information was accurate, although we have made minor modifications to the report where appropriate.

We are sending copies of this report to the agencies responsible for administering the programs we reviewed and to other interested parties. If you or your staff have any questions concerning this report, please call me at (202) 512-7014. Other GAO contacts and contributors to this report are listed in appendix IV.

Definitions of Program Services

In our review, we focused on 17 types of services or activities that programs could potentially provide to at-risk or delinquent youth. We used the following definitions for these services:

Capital Improvements. Funding for the purchase of property, facilities, and equipment used in helping youth.

Clearinghouses. Gathering and disseminating research and other information on youth.

Conflict Resolution. Assistance to individuals or groups in learning the principles of nonviolent solutions to disputes, or providing trained leaders to work with individuals or groups seeking nonviolent solutions to disputes.

Counseling. Youth counseling services to help resolve problems or difficulties stemming from emotional problems, home or family conflicts, and interpersonal relationships.

Crime/Violence Intervention. Activities to reduce violence and crime perpetrated by or against youth (except for gang violence).

Focused Activities. Activities for preventing juvenile delinquency by offering positive, alternative ways for youth to spend their time, such as recreation and sports.

Gang Intervention. Activities to help individuals, groups, or communities deter youth from joining gangs, encourage youth to leave gangs, or reduce gang violence.

Job Training Assistance. Activities focusing on helping youth prepare for or find jobs. Job search assistance includes providing instructions on job-seeking techniques, preparing a job-search plan, obtaining labor market information, and increasing motivation and self-confidence. Job placement assistance includes identifying job openings in the public or private sector and referring individuals to employers with such openings. On-the-job training is training provided to an employee in occupational or other skills essential to performing a specific job or group of jobs. Such training is generally used for entry-level employment and skill upgrades.

Mentoring. Using adult role models to assist youth in career or educational planning, and to provide encouragement and motivation.

Parental/Family Intervention. Improving parenting skills and communication within families, or otherwise promoting positive family and home life. We include in this category programs on youth pregnancy, youth parenting, and child abuse.

Planning and Program Development. Funding for planning and development activities related to youth programs.

Research/Evaluation. Studies relating to innovative approaches for planning and implementing youth programs, or evaluation of the effectiveness of such programs.

Self-Sufficiency Skills. Individual or group training in life skills (such as caring for a home, reading a bus schedule, and using a checking account) and remedial or basic skills training in academic subjects (such as math or English, English as a second language, and literacy training).

Substance Abuse Intervention. Services for drug and alcohol abusers, including both prevention and treatment.

Support Services. Assistance to individuals in overcoming barriers to participating in programs for at-risk and delinquent youth. Examples may include subsidizing the cost of child care or transportation, or providing financial support or reimbursement for medical expenses incurred by an individual or the individual's family, thereby facilitating program participation.

Training and Technical Assistance. Training and technical assistance to people responsible for program management or service delivery. This could include information dissemination on youth programs.

Tutoring. Assistance to individuals or groups in mastering academic subjects, such as reading or math, including help with homework or school projects.

Descriptions of Federal Programs for At-Risk or Delinquent Youth

In this appendix, we briefly describe the 131 federal programs that we identified as serving at-risk or delinquent youth. We provide information on each program's administering office, estimated amount of fiscal year 1995 appropriation used for youth services, legislative authorization, objectives, services provided, and target groups. The order in which we list services and target groups does not reflect program priorities. The programs are listed alphabetically, by the agencies that administer them.

Appalachian Regional Commission

Area Development Program

Administered by: Appalachian Regional Commission (in conjunction with the Department of Education).

Federal funding for youth: $722,030.

Legislative authorization: Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965, sections 211, 214, 302, Public Law 89-4, Mar. 9, 1965, as amended (40 App U.S.C. 211, 214, and 302).

Objective: To assist in the expansion and improvement of educational opportunities and services for the people of the region, as well as to provide technical assistance and research and demonstration projects that further the purpose of this act.

Services provided: Self-sufficiency skills, job training assistance, capital improvements, general health care, leadership training, and community service projects.

Target groups: Economically disadvantaged, at-risk/high-risk youth, and school dropouts.

Corporation for National and Community Service

Foster Grandparent Program

Administered by: National Senior Service Corps.

Federal funding for youth: $67.8 million.

Legislative authorization: Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973, title II, part B, section 211, Public Law 93-113, Oct. 1, 1973, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5011).

Objective: To provide foster grandparents to work with children who have drug abuse problems as well as those who are at risk of abusing drugs. Volunteers are placed through existing drug prevention programs and help children with special needs, including those who are neglected or abused. During fiscal years 1993 and 1994, special emphasis was placed on working with terminally ill children, juvenile delinquents, pregnant teenagers, and boarder babies as well as on literacy enhancement for runaway youth.

Services provided: Self-sufficiency skills, mentoring, tutoring, and parental/family intervention.

Target groups: At-risk/high-risk youth, abused/neglected, and juvenile offenders.

Retired and Senior Volunteer Program (RSVP)

Administered by: National Senior Service Corps.

Federal funding for youth: $35.7 million.

Legislative authorization: Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973, title II, part A, section 201, Public Law 93-113, Oct. 1, 1973, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5001).

Objective: To provide children and adults a creative way to share with each other through intergenerational activities. For example, volunteers (aged 55 or older) participated in a range of community drug prevention activities, such as crisis hotlines, counseling, school dropout prevention programs, and “Just Say No” programs.

Services provided: Self-sufficiency skills, crime/violence prevention, gang intervention, mentoring, tutoring, conflict resolution, counseling, substance abuse intervention, job training assistance, support services, parental/family intervention, and training and technical assistance.

Target groups: Economically disadvantaged; at-risk/high-risk youth; abused/neglected; drug/alcohol abusers; missing/exploited/abducted; delinquents; juvenile offenders; runaways/the homeless; school dropouts; victims of crime; Native Americans; and persons with special needs, such as physical or mental disabilities.

Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA)

Administered by: Americorps*VISTA.

Federal funding for youth: $13.7 million.

Legislative authorization: Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973, title I, part A, sections 103 and 109, Public Law 93-113, Oct. 1, 1973, as amended (42 U.S.C. 4953, 4959).

Objective: To combat poverty and poverty-related issues in urban and rural areas. For example, volunteers helped communities establish and expand drug prevention projects in schools, organize support groups for low-income parents to address substance abuse issues, and develop community service activities for youth as alternatives to drug use. During fiscal year 1995, issues concerning hunger, homelessness, illiteracy, drug abuse, and unemployment received special emphasis.

Services provided: Self-sufficiency skills, crime/violence intervention, mentoring, tutoring, conflict resolution, counseling, substance abuse intervention, job training assistance, focused activities, parental/family intervention, and training and technical assistance.

Target groups: Economically disadvantaged, at-risk/high-risk youth, abused/neglected, drug/alcohol abusers, delinquents, juvenile offenders, runaways/the homeless, school dropouts, victims of crime, and pregnant teens.

Department of Agriculture

4-H Youth Development Education—Cooperative Extension System

Administered by: Cooperative State Research, Education, and Extension Service.

Federal funding for youth: $63 million.

Legislative authorization: Smith-Lever Act, section 2, as amended (7 U.S.C. 342).

Objective: To develop youth potential by assisting them in acquiring knowledge, developing life skills, and forming attitudes that enable them to become self-directing, productive, and contributing members of society.

Services provided: Self-sufficiency skills, mentoring, tutoring, conflict resolution, counseling, and focused activities.

Target groups: All youth aged 5 to 19.

Children, Youth, and Families at Risk Initiative—Cooperative Extension System

Administered by: Cooperative State Research, Education, and Extension Service.

Federal funding for youth: $10 million.

Legislative authorization: Smith-Lever Act, section 2, as amended (7 U.S.C. 342).

Objective: To ensure that (1) communities provide safe, secure environments for families with children; (2) families promote positive, productive, and contributing lives for all family members; (3) parents take primary responsibility for meeting their children's physical, social, emotional, and intellectual needs and provide moral guidance and direction; (4) youth demonstrate knowledge, skills, attitudes, and behavior necessary for fulfilling, contributing lives; (5) babies are born healthy; and (6) children have their basic physical, social, emotional, and intellectual needs met.

Services provided: Clearinghouse.

Target groups: All youth.

Commencement 2000

Administered by: Forest Service.

Federal funding for youth: $104,000.

Legislative authorization: Forest Service Cooperative Agreements Act, section 1, Public Law 94-148, Dec. 12, 1975, as amended (16 U.S.C. 565a-1).

Objective: To inform and educate children in particular schools about natural resources and foster interest in pursuing study and careers in natural resources, particularly among Hispanic, African-American, Asian-American, and Native American students. (This is a pilot initiative limited to the West Coast.)

Services provided: Informational, educational, and experiential services.

Target groups: Minority students in kindergarten through 12th grade.

Food Stamp Employment and Training Program

Administered by: Food and Nutrition Service.

Federal funding for youth: Amount not available. Agency officials could not determine the portion of funds spent on youth.

Legislative authorization: Food Stamp Act of 1977, section 6(d)(4), Public Law 95-113, Aug. 31, 1964, as amended (7 U.S.C. 2015(d)(4)).

Objective: To improve Food Stamp recipients' ability to gain employment, increase earnings, and reduce their dependency on public assistance.

Services provided: Self-sufficiency skills and job training assistance.

Target groups: Economically disadvantaged.

Partnerships Against Violence Network
(PAVNET)

Administered by: National Agricultural Library (in conjunction with the Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs).
